aging Rifles and ammunition containers which are protected from water are provided for environmental, weather, and security reasons. As such, they should be sealed and waterproofed by the manufacturers to prevent premature aging of the product. The industry standard is to use a specially-formulated plastic which contains both a resin and a catalyst that allow the material to react with water. Once the plastic has reacted with the water, it will become inert (do not further react with water), and consequently waterproof. Plastic must be kept dry in any event as water can permanently deteriorate plastic components such as steel linkages which are found inside of firearms packaging. The rear of many rifles are fitted with precisely machined steel latch pins that are integral to the bolt operation. Keeping the pins wet caused issues during warranty service. Like all of the other components inside the gun, require a good amount of care and maintenance to keep the steel shinier than the rest of the packaging. 2) Polyethylene Polyethylene barrels and liners are most often used as they are easy to work with and easy to dye so that different colors can be used. Unfortunately, they also melt at a lower temperature than most materials. Packaging out of polyethylene cannot be used with higher performance ammunition, as the propellant will melt the container, causing the firearm to be unusable. 3) Wood While wood is a preferred material for log stocks, it is vulnerable to water damage. Wood can be easily dented or warpage if proper precautions are not undertaken. The lip of the bottom of a rifle will also start to rot if wood is used. With this in mind, many manufacturers will provide a thicker front lip to the barrels and liners to ensure that any water doesn't get inside. Most wooden rifle packaging can be discarded after use, but make sure to do so before arrival at the range and approval before firing. If the packaging is damaged after firing you can return it to the manufacturer for reimbursement. 4) PPS and Acrylic PPS and acrylic are very good choices for shooters who are looking for durability. These materials do have an impact on recoil, but to a much lesser extent than wood or steel. The plastic materials that PPS is manufactured under are very resilient and will protect firearms effectively at all ranges under normal usage. While shooters do have the option to finish off most materials, PPS tends to be spotless with little risk of damage by the firing pin. Acrylic on the other
