Wednesday, March 27, 2011 Well, I got a little excited last night and decided to start in the kitchen and cook up some beans. I had some leftover bean sprouts and bacon from one of my recent fridge raids, and some leftover oatmeal from a typical mish-mash that is my breakfast - and just in time for lunch. I decided I would roll out some oatmeal for breakfast and then cook up some beans for dinner. Of course, I ended up oversleeping and getting home from work later than usual. By the time I got in the door, I had a cup of coffee and a quick snack of dry toast. Back to the kitchen for some quick-n-easy dinners! Now, I have to say that I have never been a huge fan of tofu. When I was little, the thought of eating it made me really gag and have headaches. I thought it was strange that a vegetarian would eat tofu! But my husband L

Eliminating dental fear: perceptions of dental staff. The aim of this study was to investigate whether dental practice staff, when compared with patients, show a more negative attitude towards dental anxiety and to examine whether any differences in staff attitudes to dental anxiety exist according to personal or professional characteristics. A self-administered questionnaire was designed to assess dental practice staff attitudes towards patients' anxiety, and its psychometric properties were analysed. Dental practice staff (n = 532) and patients (n = 556) from 21 randomly selected practices were asked to complete the questionnaire. Participants completed demographic and perceived behavioural control items, and the Situational Dental Anxiety Scale (S-DAS). A dental practice staff's attitude towards anxiety is a positive one. Staff respondents are more likely to endorse the statement that patients are afraid of the dentist (P
