Q: Is it possible to boot an arm64 kernel on x86 machine? I'm currently building an IoT device which is able to run on both x86 and arm64. Unfortunately the hardware isn't yet available, so I'm prototyping it on x86 at the moment, but the question remains: Can an x86 machine boot an arm64 kernel? The reason why I'm asking is that I'd like to use an arm64 kernel (android) and have the firmware become loaded as x86 when the hardware becomes available. I understand the bootloader will stop that from working, but at the moment I'm just after how far the kernel can be made to run. Is this possible? A: I think you're confusing architecture with target architecture. It is possible to boot an ARM kernel on an x86 machine (assuming that you're using the same OS on both x86 and ARM). It is also possible to boot an x86 kernel on an ARM machine, as well as cross-compiling ARM code for x86. It seems to me that you are not necessarily interested in cross-compiling ARM code for x86 or the other way around. Edit: With regards to cross compiling.

A new lunar eclipse will take place in 2019, and some of us have even gotten restless looking for it on the Internet. According to NASA's Peter Stillman, there are more than two million lunar eclipses recorded, and this one will be the first one that will occur in the same month that our spring equinox occurs. The peak of the event will be on March 20, and it will be visible in the United States, Mexico, Central and South America, Europe, Africa, Australia, and the Pacific. On the face of it, an eclipse of any kind seems to promise interesting events; given the past, do we have any idea what might happen? There is, of course, the most famous of all lunar eclipses of the twentieth century, the partial eclipse of November 12, 1963. It was given the name "Blood Moon" because of the changes in the color of the moon, which does seem to turn somewhat red. Unlike a more total lunar eclipse, which is usually annular, this one also had some reddening on its face. Not much has been published about this eclipse, although some of the satellites orbiting the moon were turned dark. They would light up later on the night of the eclipse, but they were dark during the eclipse. A more recent eclipse — the total lunar eclipse of September 27, 1999 — was given the name "Super Blood Moon" because of the omen that it was supposed to bring. Not much was done with that one, though the world of forecasters continued to focus on the "Supermoon 648931e174

There are a number of services for associating a user with an item on the Internet, such as Amazon's associate program and Facebook. The presence of such programs shows that consumer products and services are beginning to integrate more effectively on the Internet. Users are already familiar with the buying process in such stores, and so a way to further enhance the buying experience is to enhance the knowledge of users. The invention relates to a way of providing a user with more information about a found item. The information provides the user with more ability to judge the quality of the item and therefore the price at which he will be willing to buy the item. Thus, the present invention is an improvement over the prior art by providing more information for the user. In a preferred embodiment of the invention, a user invokes a web site with a Uniform Resource Identifier (URI). The web site is adapted to associate the URI with a found item. When the URI is sent to the web site, the web site transmits a title of the found item. The title is displayed to the user when the web site is invoked. The web site may store information regarding the found item and/or items in a database and transmit the information to the URI. The user may also be informed regarding the quality of the item. In one embodiment of the invention, the title of the item is a name for the item. For example, the title may be xe2x80x9cAmazon.comxe2x80x9d. In another embodiment, the title of the item is the URL associated with the found item. For example, a title may be xe2x80x9cthemoviefavorites.com/amazon/xe2x80x9d. In another embodiment of the invention, when the user
