.Q: Variables @property Can someone explain to me why this code gives me an error of "variable not defined"?
class Foo: def __init__(self): self.name = "foo" @property def name(self): return self.name
f = Foo() print f.name
This is the error: NameError: name 'f' is not defined
A: You need to put the property statement in the same namespace as the class:
class Foo: def __init__(self): self.name = "foo" @property def name(self): return self.name
f = Foo() print f.name
A: Your problem is that you're not defining your Foo class. You only have a method. You need to define it:
class Foo: def __init__(self): self.name = "foo" @property def name(self): return self.name
Then your code will work.
As @Cascabel said, you also need to make the self parameter available. This is usually done as self, but it's your call.
Update: I added an initializer to the question as you can't change your class once it

Life skills and useful lessons in a post-apocalyptic world Syndicated on The Huffington Post, Russia Today, Wall Street Journal, and almost 100 other sites Sunday, April 12, 2014 If we don't preserve the environment now, there will be more massive disasters later... more landslides, floods, droughts, wildfires. But protecting the planet is not just a moral imperative, it's also an economically wise decision. Here's why: The majority of the world's population lives in cities, and cities are built on flood plains, generally along rivers. Houses, businesses and farmland are built on river terraces, the land considered suitable for such development because it's just barely above the river. If the waters flow just a little too far, they can scour the soil out of the terraces and leave behind a wasteland of mud. This might not be a problem if the terrain were always flat, but flooding has become common, because the planet has become warmer. Rising temperatures will bring more rain, but more importantly will make the planet's vast rivers swell and rush further up their valleys. If the areas at risk are built on lower ground, the building's foundations are at risk. That's why a few days ago, researchers published a study that demonstrated the devastating consequences of the 2012 floods in Beijing. More than a million buildings were at risk. A November 2013 study by Chinese researchers estimated that the floods cost the country more than $28 billion and left more than 300 million people temporarily homeless. Those were just the losses in China. In March of last year, the same problem struck Sao Paulo, Brazil. The city was hit by the worst floods in a century, and most of the casualties, damage and suffering occurred because of an overloaded sewer system. More than 200 people died. If we don't preserve the environment now, there will be more massive disasters later... more landslides, floods, droughts, wildfires. But protecting the planet is not just a moral imperative, it's also an economically wise decision. Here's why:
