In the process of cleaning clogged pipelines, to date it has been required to excavate the pipeline, one end thereof being first opened to enable access thereto. The excavated material is then carefully removed by hand, the hand removal being time consuming. The opening operation may be accomplished by the use of a mechanical percussive device such as a rotary hammer or a "powder gun". Use of such a device will often produce some harm to the pipeline wall, particularly if the device is operated during the middle of an excavation job. The excavated material has been removed by hand in "scoopers", carts or buckets. It is the usual practice to "rake" the material into one end of a small diameter, plank-like, cylindrical container, and then, when full, to tap or "rattle" the bottom of the container and empty the contents. A substantial quantity of material may remain in the container and it is usually manually cleaned by repeated raking and emptying. This is time consuming and results in soil being spread about the excavation site
