But the real issue, says Microsoft, is that it is all too easy to screw up your Internet security by using unsupported versions of browser software. That's a good point -- and if you think about it, Microsoft is right. Internet Explorer 8 hasn't been around for long, and probably won't be around for much longer. But if you have any doubts about the security of IE 8, well, then you probably shouldn't be using it. You should be using something else. But there's one problem. Microsoft doesn't seem to want anyone else to use something else. And there's a good reason for that: Microsoft isn't making much money from IE 8, because so many people are already on IE 8 or on IE 7. So Microsoft has told the world that it would be a bad thing for people to switch to Firefox or Chrome, which is much more popular. But that's just silly. The people who use IE 8 should switch to something else, and nobody should be using an old version of IE anyway, because the thing is that Internet Explorer is a security nightmare. Not Always A Security Nightmare We've known for a long time that Internet Explorer is a security nightmare, and there are many examples of that. There was the time when IE got new features without security fixes, and the time when Internet Explorer 8 was released without all of the security updates it needed. There have been many other examples, and most of the recent ones come from Microsoft. And now that Internet Explorer 8 is out, Microsoft has been telling everyone that it is a great thing that you should switch over to Internet Explorer 8, even if it is an unsupported version. It
