In the past year, new percutaneous transluminal coronary angioplasty (PTCA) techniques have been developed that may improve the rate of procedural success and reduce the incidence of major complications. These techniques appear promising but their widespread use must await documentation of their safety and effectiveness. In addition, the recent publication of 3 additional randomized trials comparing PTCA with medical therapy have failed to demonstrate a significant superiority for PTCA. Thus, at this time, the application of PTCA should be considered in carefully selected patients who have proven refractory angina or severe, symptomatic, functionally disabling coronary artery disease. It is known that the surfaces of hard, brittle materials can be polished to the point of near-transparency by combining a powder abrasive with a liquid polishing medium. Abrasive material, as commonly understood, is any material which will scratch or penetrate a surface upon the application of sufficient pressure and/or velocity of the abrasive relative to the surface being ground or polished. Abrasive materials are generally diamond, ruby, or aluminum oxide. The powdered abrasive acts as a grinding agent, while the liquid polishing medium reduces the friction, prevents slippage of the abrasive powder, and enhances the penetrative properties of the abrasive. The above-described grinding and polishing technique is commonly referred to as "liquid polishing." In practice, the liquid polishing technique is often referred to as the "rubbing process" or "lapping process." In this process, a circular lapping film of abrasive and liquid polishing medium is slowly squeezed into contact with the surface to be ground or polished. The lapping film is continually advanced in the desired path of grinding or polishing, the film thickness being gradually reduced. A problem in the past has been the maintenance of the 6d1f23a050
