Instead, most bibliographic research and interpretation is usually undertaken, followed by the writing of books in which all aspects of the historical work—from the preservation of primary material through the writing of scholarly commentary and the editing of the text—are handled by professional authors and editors. Sometimes, the work is commissioned by a publisher. In such instances, the publisher (or a commercial entity) may bring in a scholar to work on the text and produce an edited version, which it then publishes as a "stand-alone" book. This is different. Metatext books are not collections of edited versions of old texts. Metatext books are original works; the authors are scholars and editors as well as the original source. A metatext book is a work of scholarship, made possible by the digital age.
