The first time Hermione used a wand with Voldemort's mark on it, she discovered that she could use the wand to cast spells, and that the magical sliver from Voldemort's mark enabled the wand to cast any spell Hermione desired, as long as she was connected to the source of the wand. [9] However, Hermione was not very familiar with wandlore, such as the fact that, since most wizards could not cast spells without first learning wandlore, a wand was like a miniature magical typewriter. This was because it was designed to teach a wizard how to cast a particular spell, rather than use magic on their own, which Hermione did not know how to do. She therefore used the elder wand to cast a Cruciatus Curse on herself, which is another way of killing yourself by casting a spell on yourself. Despite her frustration with her ability to control her new body, Hermione soon discovered that she was a witch, and that she was able to cast spells as well. She learned the basics of wandlore by looking up the spells and the rules in The Standard Book of Wizarding Transformations and The Standard Book of Spells. Despite Hermione having a relatively small amount of information to start with, she gained a lot of strength while using the Elder Wand, and would end up dueling with Voldemort himself, until she accidentally killed him. Once she had killed Voldemort, she was given the Elder Wand by her godfather, Albus Dumbledore, who had assumed that, since she had finally agreed to be a follower of Voldemort, she would at least consider the fact that she had killed her godfather. However, given her anger and tears at the time, it was unlikely that she would have been receptive to such a gesture.

She spent her childhood listening to stories about Harry, Sirius Black, Dumbledore, and others. She often asked Tom Riddle about the "wizarding world" in her early years at Hogwarts, but Tom looked at her with pity and asked her about her hopes of marrying a Muggle. When she was six, she was told that Sirius Black, a failed assassin and bigamist, killed her parents and escaped, and after that she knew nothing more. This, combined with her age, made Harry Potter's alter ego, Sirius Black, her ideal man. One of the main problems Harry had to face during his time as an Auror was the refusal of the Dursleys to allow him to visit Gringotts Wizarding Bank to look into the accounts for a spell to identify the real owners of the Lestrange Vault, as its contents, including the Sword, had disappeared. The only way he could do so was to use an Unforgivable Curses on the Dursleys, but this would affect them. In the end, Hermione had to use one on Mrs Dursley, but she was willing to do so only if Harry and Ginny were allowed to visit her sister. Hermione had a column in a newspaper called The Quibbler. A few times she wrote informative articles on magical and political subjects, most notably in 1999 when she discussed the dangers of misusing time-traveling spells. She served as an editor for The Quibbler for several years until she left in 2000. She was also made a member of the Wizengamot. She served for four years before leaving in 2004. She remained at the ministry until May 2005 and then took a job as a Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher at Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, her alma mater. She began her new position by using her Time-Turner to go back to 1939 and save Mrs. Weasley and Harry from Dolores Umbridge. Umbridge was sent from that time to the past by Bellatrix Lestrange to kill Dumbledore, and she succeeded in doing so. Hermione used the Time-Turner to find Voldemort, and later Voldemort used it to go back to the past and kill the Potters in 1979. Voldemort could not control her time-turner, but he still had considerable influence over her past. As such, he was able to ensure her continued success and that the right choices were made in the past, when he had them to choose from. He also extended a protective invisibility over Hermione's past to protect her. 5ec8ef588b
