capital markets open the gate to the development of capitalism, while it is the gate which closes the door to the development of capitalism. although there is no free market, free competition has enabled the use of capital to become the engine of growth, and the capitalist society is always seeking new sources of capital (peters, 1998). large corporations have used the internet to obtain and develop intellectual property, allowing them to overcome the information barriers imposed by digital data flows. copyright protection has resulted in rising protectionism, as companies turn to economies of scale to avoid the costs of intellectual property protection (brunner-traut, martin, and braun, 2009), because capital markets open the gate to the development of capitalism. copyright laws impede economic activity, but the internet has a greater potential to promote economic activity in developing countries. copyright piracy allows the fastest and cheapest way of producing intellectual works. the benefit of intellectual property, copyright and other trade secrets are also involved in the use of the internet as a means of trade, because intellectual property and copyright ownership are inextricably bound with the exercise of the right of authorship, ownership and control over these rights are inseparable from the existence and vitality of industrial and economic development (kielinger, 2002). this means that intellectual property should be protected by property rights are essential to the development and operation of the free market (brunner-traut, martin, and braun, 2009); the risk of lessening the protections of intellectual property rights now can cause serious problems in the future, especially in the developing countries. protection of intellectual property rights in these countries, where it is now difficult to create it own intellectual property, is said to be beneficial for the investors and the host countries. intellectual property rights have become more important to the development of industrialisation, as it helps the producers to utilise technology to create wealth; the cost of protecting property rights is significantly lower than the value of the property rights themselves (brunner-traut, martin, and braun, 2009). copyright also is recognised as a form of property, and owners of copyright have a basic constitutional right to exploit their rights. the benefits of copyright lies in the fact that it serves as a tool to promote the economics of developing nations by stimulating the development of intellectual property. the value of intellectual property in the process of creating goods and services have become the fastest and the cheapest way of creating goods and services, and it contributes to industrialisation as a measure of progress, value and wealth (brunner-traut, martin, and braun, 2009).
