When State-by-State Gas Taxes Determine Your Driving Emissions: Arizona's Massive Gas Tax Hoax Federal transportation funding has been a flashpoint of national politics for at least four decades now, and to some, it seems like it will be a flashpoint for the foreseeable future. As federal tax revenue declines and as entitlement spending pressures continue to grow, U.S. lawmakers are contending with the need to find alternate sources of funding for highway and mass transit projects, and a significant proportion of the conversation is centered on how to fund such projects with fewer dollars or indeed without dollars at all. The fiscal imperative is underlined by the Highway Trust Fund, an account that pays for road and bridge construction with money borrowed from the Treasury. That fund is due to be depleted sometime between October and March of 2015, leaving U.S. lawmakers at a loss of where to turn for cash to pay for their highway projects. The debate over the future of the Highway Trust Fund is one of many that center on the so-called gas tax. While the federal gas tax - which is paid by drivers at the pump - has been a steady source of funding for the Highway Trust Fund since the early 1990s, there has been discussion in recent years about whether the gas tax should be 2edc1e01e8
