In my experience, the Photoshop workflow is always the most accurate, most reliable, and fastest editing tool to work with for traditional images. It does have a completely different workflow, however, for images captured with mobile devices. Photoshop CC 2015.1 is built on the latest version of the Creative Suite, Photoshop CC 2015, which was released back in May. The full update is available now for free via the Creative Cloud. Creative Cloud members are entitled to free seats for live and on-demand classes, the latest Photoshop CC development team can create interactive whiteboard videos, and each member gets free access to the Adobe After Effects and Adobe Premiere Pro apps. The new Camera Raw tab in the Library panel has a number of goodies. There's a new camera comparison panel available in the Preview window and an automatic camera profile correction process. Built-in presets have been improved, and there's even a new export destination for JPEGs - an option called JPEG for Web and Mobile. As I use Lightroom mostly to view, manage and edit JPEGs, I wasn't expecting that this extra tab would make me think differently about editing it, but with its help, the landscape of Lightroom truly becomes a bit more professional. In this tab, you have Face Control: Skin Spots, Auto Exposure, Auto Color, Curves, Exposure, Saturation, etc. For example, what professional photo would not have a perfectly white skin with only a little bit of pink? So, if you don't follow this feature, you can first select the exact area of your skin which is to be subjected to the desired skin spot effect. The program will make a histogram of the selected area and then brighten or darken it with the provided slider. I am a bit of a skeptic when it comes to Adobe, but the way this feature is implemented is perfect. I like being able to see the histogram of the affected area, because it really helps me clean the image up. I gave it a try, and the results are generally pleasing. I especially like the Auto Color and Auto Exposure features. At first, I didn't dare to make use of Auto settings, thinking Lightroom would do a similar job to one of my older cameras. But one of the dialog boxes that appeared when using Auto Exposure revealed just how much Lightroom can improve a photograph. I know a lot of people who would not use Auto settings!
