Introduction ===== Helicobacter pylori (HP) is one of the most common bacteria found in the stomach. This bacterium is a Gram-negative, spiral-shaped, microaerophilic coccobacillus that colonizes the human stomach. Gastric mucosa is damaged in many pathological conditions such as gastritis, ulcers, duodenal ulcer and gastric adenocarcinoma [\[\[@B1\]\]](#). Helicobacter pylori gastritis is an inflammatory process with the characteristic histological features. In the early stages of this disease, there is intense infiltration of neutrophils, plasma cells and lymphocytes. In the advanced stages of inflammation, the mucosa becomes hyperplastic and the glands atrophy. In addition, some changes may occur in the surface epithelium such as loss of gastric pits, proliferation of surface epithelial cells and increased vascularity. In some patients, these changes can lead to neoplasia [\[\[@B2\]\]](#).

Case presentation ===== A 47-year-old female patient referred to Tehran Heart Center, Tehran, Iran, with left adrenal nodules, was admitted for the management of hypertension and with upper gastrointestinal bleeding. She had no previous surgical or medical history. On admission, examination of the oral cavity revealed a pale and stomatodynia. The patient's vital signs were in the normal range. Routine laboratory tests showed no abnormalities. However, due to the previous history of melena, upper endoscopy was performed and a multiple ulcers were discovered in the gastric corpus. Multiple biopsies were done. The pathology study showed atrophy and destruction of the glands with infiltration of lymphocytes and plasma cells. Hyperplasia of the surface epithelium and a few inclusions were also seen in the biopsy. Because of the appearance of gastric atrophy with hyperplasia of the surface epithelium, a diagnosis of HP infection was suggested. Therefore, a noninvasive and accurate test for HP infection was performed, and the serology was positive. We performed HP stool antigen test
