The amount of dietary protein required for optimal reproductive performance in ruminants is an important issue because of the economic importance of reproduction and the dependence of maternal and newborn health on the quality of milk. In beef cattle, a low crude protein (CP) diet, averaging only 130 g/kg DM, appears adequate for optimal pregnancy and initial lactation. The dietary CP requirement for lactation appears to be similar, at about 130 g/kg DM in a period of about 20 weeks. Increased protein intake above the requirements for maintenance of pregnancy and lactation is not beneficial. An intermediate level, between 130 and 150 g/kg DM, appears optimal for pregnancy but still allows optimal weight gain for the mother and calf at parturition. Studies in sheep have shown conflicting results for the effect of increasing dietary CP on the whole gestation period. In ruminants, as in rodents, the optimal dietary CP concentration for the pregnant female is much lower than for the dam during lactation. This is not only because lactation requires a greater supply of amino acids (protein) per litre of milk, but also
